

power was lost Townsquare radio was often the only source of information for the storm's victims. As the hard-hit communities struggled to recover the stations kept the public informed of where and how they could access resources and assistance. During what was a long difficult year for those whose homes or businesses have not yet been restored, Townsquare has continued to help guide storm victims to sources of help. To this day, Townsquare raises funds to help the rebuilding effort.

As people across New Jersey join together to "Light Up New Jersey" it is important that as we honor the heroic efforts and attitudes of the year past but we also must remember that the job isn't done. There are still families with lost or damaged homes, businesses that have not yet been restored, roadways that haven't been rebuilt. We have come a long way since October 29th of last year, but our work is not complete. We have come together as one New Jersey community in the year since Superstorm Sandy hit, we know we have the ability and the resolve to continue until the job is done.

Sincerely,

A handwritten signature in black ink, appearing to read "Sweeney", written over a horizontal line.

Steve Sweeney
Senate President